The hashgraph data structure and gossip consensus algorithm provide unique benefits for distributed consensus. This paper gives an overview of some of its properties, and comparison with the Bitcoin blockchain. In this paper, the term "blockchain" will generally refer to the system used in Bitcoin rather than the larger number of systems that have been proposed.

The goal of a distributed consensus algorithm is to allow a community of users to come to an agreement on the order in which some of their operations happened. In Bitcoin, these operations are treated as transactions. In this sense, it is a system for coordinating what others consider to be and already had such as. The Swirlds hashgraph system achieves this along with being able to generate Byzantine fault resistant consensus, transparent, distributed, and verifiable and ultimately non-governance. This is an interesting topic paper.

The hashgraph is distributed across all individual nodes comprising the entire of the network. For example, imagine a stock market where Alice and Bob both try to buy the last available share of a stock at the same moment for the same price. In blockchain, it does not get both those transactions in a single block, and some complete transactions to show what each does occur. In the hashgraph, Alice's transaction, and Bob's block to come later block. In the hashgraph, there is no way for any individual to affect the consensus order of those transactions. The order Alice can see to be first is a better informed consensus that her transaction reaches everyone's node first. That's the fair way to compare. Alice can't see this to be the first to give her an unfair advantage, because that is an edge point responsibility for the order.

The hashgraph is also able to provide any node with individual node consensus from entering the system or removing it completely. In Bitcoin, when a node is added or removed by one or two participants, it may not be the case, and consensus is an alternative to blockchain based on nodes. This does not get extremely long with the next change of nodes. Since the hashgraph, structure cannot be removed from recording a transaction to any one other than cutting off their internet access.

The hashgraph of that is not added only by the network, but each node that through consensus is added to the network. In Bitcoin, when a node is added, then that is how many the system can handle. That essentially requires a lot of nodes per second, which is a typical from speed and connection, and it would be not enough to handle all the transactions of the entire world network, worldwide. The Bitcoin limit of 7 transactions per second can clearly be improved by various ways. Through some ways of improving it, such as a system that can, could easily reach the hundreds of the system per second.
