Remember that an artist's drawing does not always have a single, fixed meaning. The caption below can be read in two ways.

PROBLEM 1.1

General Negative Space

Make a drawing in which you combine positive shapes to make up the positive shape of your subject. In other words, no one shape is the positive shape.

Take Robert Rauschenberg's drawing of a face (see problem 1.11) and recombine the shapes to make up the face in a different way. Figure 1.13 is one solution. Notice that the composition has been so recombined that the subject is no longer a face. The composition is the same, but the subject is now a collection of shapes. The caption is the same as the one in the book.

Concrete Shape

Make a collection of shapes that combine to make up a concrete shape. The book uses an example of the example of this in the book drawing (see Figure 1.12), in which the shape of the woman's face is the subject. The shapes are used to create a subject, which is a collection of shapes. The caption is the same as the one in the book.
