acceptance behavior is critical to the safety and operational performance of unsignalized intersections The complex nature of the human behavior and its dependence on various socioeconomic and environmental parameters makes it challenging for transportation professionals to assess the performance of such intersections To investigate the behavioral patterns of drivers at unsignalized intersections a novel procedure was developed and validated for the accurate observation of naturalistic gap acceptance behavior Specifically the authors examined two way stop controlled TWSC intersections with a two way left turn lane TWLTL on the major road After examining the critical gap and identifying behavioral changes caused by waiting time time of day presence of passengers and presence of queue the authors further investigated the relationship between waiting time and gap acceptance and analyzed the variations in waiting time for right and left turn maneuvers The results of this study reinforce the notion that driver behavior is affected by external factors such as waiting time time of day presence of passengers presence of queue etc and should continue to be investigated in localities across the country Advances in

Left Turn Gap Acceptance at an Unsignalized Intersection Fred J. Kaiser,1951 Modeling Gap Acceptance and Driver Behavior at Stopped Controlled Intersections (priority Intersections) Rene' Senyo Lord-Attivor,2012 Priority intersections are intersections controlled by a stop or yield sign A vehicle at a priority intersection from a minor road makes a choice to either accept or reject an available gap when joining or crossing the main road Various factors affect the driver s decision to accept or reject a gap at the priority intersection The characteristics of the driver vehicle and the intersection itself play major roles in the driver s behavior at the intersection Factors such as the driver s age gender waiting time intersection delay and the vehicles accelerating capability affect the decision to accept or reject a gap The gap acceptance concept in developed countries e g United States of America has historically been studied and researched at signalized and unsignalized intersections However in developing countries little research has been conducted on this concept or on the driver s behavior particularly Ghana Yet traffic analysis software programs built to suit a developed country s condition are often used to analyze intersections in developing countries like Ghana Ghanaian engineers have yet to develop a gap acceptance model suitable for unsignalized intersections This research analyzes gaps and driver behavior at unsignalized intersections for both cross 4 leg intersections and T intersections for left right and through moving vehicles from minor roads onto major roads left turning vehicles from the major roads onto the minor roads are also analyzed Critical gap values and the most common driver s variable is determined The results of the critical gaps values found in this research are compared to that of the recommended values from the 2010 Highway Capacity Manual HCM The results of the analysis showed critical gaps lower than that of the recommended values from the 2010 HCM A comparison between the critical gaps determined in this research and the recommended 2010 HCM critical gaps showed lower delays when the critical gaps found in this research were modeled in aaSidra and the Highway Capacity Software HCS The Logistics Regression analysis showed that most drivers at priority intersections will accept gaps equal or greater than the critical gap determined in this research The analysis also showed that pedestrian and hawking activities at intersections are not contributing factors to a driver s decision in accepting a gap The driver s decision to accept or reject a gap varied between locations Although the driver s decision to accept or reject a gap varied between locations the most common factor variable that affected a driver s decision to accept or reject a gap was the time spent at the stop sign Abstract Transportation Research Record ,2000
