1.1 Introduction

Classical or Newtonian mechanics deals with the motions of bodies travelling at velocities that are very much less than the velocity of light. According to it, the three fundamental concepts of Physics, viz., space, time and mass are all absolute and invariant.

Concept of space. Newton assumed that space is absolute and "exists in itself, without relation to anything external and remains unaffected under all circumstances". This means to say that the length of an object is independent of the conditions under which it is measured, such as the motion of the object or the experimenter.

Concept of time. According to Newton, time is absolute "by its very nature flowing uniformly without reference to anything external". Hence there is a universal time flowing at a constant rate, unaffected by the motion or position of objects and observers. This implies two things:

(1) The interval of time between two events has the same value for all observers, irrespective of their state of motion.
