Revenue Recognition					The first step is to identify the revenue-generating activities of the company. This includes identifying the products and services that the company sells, the terms of sale, and the methods of payment. The second step is to determine the revenue recognition criteria. This involves identifying the events and conditions that must occur before revenue can be recognized. For example, the company may require that the product has been shipped and that the customer has accepted it. The third step is to record the revenue. This involves debiting the Accounts Receivable account and crediting the Revenue account. The amount recorded should be based on the terms of sale and the revenue recognition criteria.	Review the first three steps to ensure that they are properly documented and that the revenue recognition criteria are clearly defined. Review the revenue recognition process to ensure that it is properly implemented and that the revenue is recorded accurately.
