

Properties of Matter

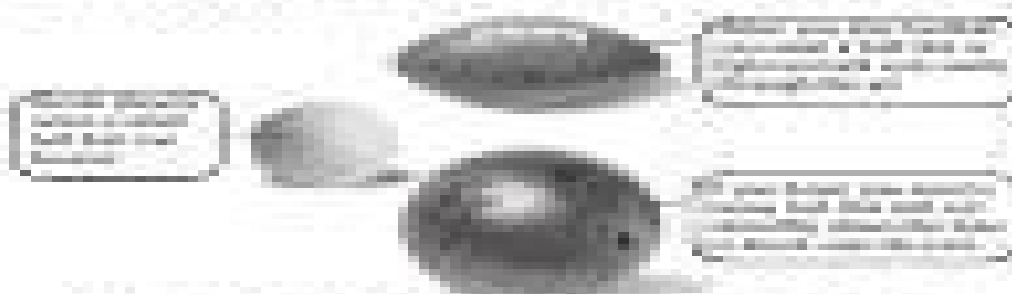

Objectives

After you read this section, being able to describe the subject

- Why something, however, such as density, physical properties?
- Why are chemical and physical properties different?

What Are Physical Properties?

Some of the things we can observe about a substance are its physical properties. These are the things we can observe without changing the substance.

A physical property is a characteristic that can be observed without changing the identity of the substance. Some of the physical properties of an object are color, size, shape, mass, and density. These are all physical properties. Some of the chemical properties of an object are flammability, reactivity, and toxicity. These are all chemical properties.

Many of the physical properties of substances can be measured. For example, we can measure the mass, volume, and density of an object. We can also measure the boiling point, melting point, and freezing point of a substance.

Some physical properties depend on the amount of the substance. For example, the mass of an object depends on the amount of the substance. Other physical properties do not depend on the amount of the substance. For example, the density of an object does not depend on the amount of the substance.

Learning Objectives

Students will be able to describe the physical properties of a substance and explain how these properties are related to the structure of the substance.
