Diffusion Through a Membrane

A Laboratory Activity for the Living Environment

Diffusion is an important living process. It allows the cells of an organism to obtain the materials they need to survive. In other organisms, it allows the cells to get rid of the wastes they produce. In plants, it allows the cells to obtain the water they need to grow. In animals, it allows the cells to get rid of wastes. Diffusion is the process by which particles move from an area of higher concentration to an area of lower concentration. Diffusion continues until the particles are evenly distributed. In a living organism, this is called homeostasis. The cells of a living organism are constantly exchanging materials with their environment.

When a cell is surrounded by a solution, the cell membrane acts as a barrier. The cell membrane is made of phospholipids. The heads of the phospholipids are hydrophilic, and the tails are hydrophobic. This means that the cell membrane is made of two layers of phospholipids. The heads of the phospholipids are on the outside of the cell, and the tails are on the inside of the cell. This means that the cell membrane is made of two layers of phospholipids. The heads of the phospholipids are on the outside of the cell, and the tails are on the inside of the cell.

Some parts of the cell membrane are made of proteins. These proteins are called channel proteins. They allow materials to pass through the cell membrane. Some channel proteins are made of one protein, and some are made of two proteins. The channel proteins are made of one protein, and some are made of two proteins. The channel proteins are made of one protein, and some are made of two proteins.
