Campus Resources

Hi, it's me, Andre. I really was glad that I didn't skip the first class. In addition to receiving my syllabus and learning about the instructor's expectations, I learned a lot about some really cool campus resources. The only bad thing was that I didn't talk to many of my classmates or even the instructor after class. I know it's important to get to know the instructor and my peers for group work. But I hate making small talk and introducing myself to people sometimes. And there were so many people waiting to talk to the instructor.

I realized as I approached the table that it was my instructor from class. He was there by himself for lunch, just reading the newspaper. I decided that it was my second chance, and, before I took his order, I introduced myself and said I was in his class. He was so nice and reminded me to stop by during office hours if I had any questions. And then he asked my recommendation for the best sandwich on the menu! I realized it was silly to have been nervous about introducing myself all along.

1. Have you ever felt uncomfortable introducing yourself to strangers in a new situation? What did you do to make this experience easier?
2. Would it have been appropriate for Andre to ask his instructor questions about the syllabus during lunch? Why or why not?

Using Calendars Effectively

After my divorce, I was left to handle the responsibility of parenting my two sons alone. That decision seemed to change my life—for better and for worse.

By the third week of classes, I felt completely overwhelmed. I didn't see how I could go on playing the roles of good mother, reliable bank teller, and successful student all at once. There just didn't seem to be enough hours in the day.

I sought the advice of a good friend who is also a student. He doesn't have any children, but he does care for his sick parents on a daily basis. He told me that prioritizing his daily tasks, using a calendar, and sticking to his schedule helped him a lot, so I thought I would try the same approach. To start, I made a list of doctor appointments, recitals, field trips, and other upcoming kid-related events. Then I
