THE MOTIVATION

Leaders spend a great deal of time and effort studying the technical aspects of their jobs. However, in order to lead effectively, they must also know what makes people "tick." The leading human behavior, leaders study why people act and react in certain ways. Plus, leaders who care about their subordinates and are attentive to their needs are more able to influence them in accomplishing work goals. This lesson identifies three basic needs and explains how they can be satisfied.

INTRODUCTION

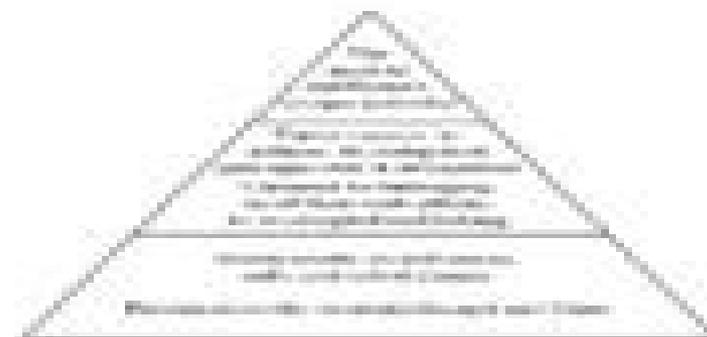

Studying human behavior helps leaders to acquire the knowledge they need to better understand themselves and those they lead.

It is important that leaders learn why human beings act and react in certain ways and to identify various types of behavior. They also need to know to influence the behavior of subordinates so that their personal goals coincide or align with the goals of management.

MASLOW'S HIERARCHY OF NEEDS

According to psychologist Abraham H. Maslow, human beings are influenced by a progression of needs. In Maslow's theory, human needs develop from lower to higher needs over the lifetime of a person. Maslow believed that although virtually all people reach the top level, these needs do develop in all of us. So the extent to the top we reach and how long we stay there, we must first satisfy the lower needs. The satisfaction of these lower needs motivates people to reach higher levels. It is important to remember that one person's needs are the same as those of another — they might vary in the degree of importance.

Thus, people generally behave in a way that first satisfies these needs for physical comfort and safety, then they satisfy their needs for social acceptance and self-actualization.
