Creative Component: A New Scene from the New Employee’s Perspective

After that long tour in the office, I was invited to occupy my cubicle. I could not help feeling uneasy after learning the absurd instructions. Suddenly, the bell rang, and all the people in the office abruptly got up and went to the room next to the main hall. Not knowing what model of behavior to accept, I decided to give myself up to the movement of the crowd and follow everyone else. In the hall, there was a huge screen and many chairs for workers. All the people entering the hall seemed to know what was going on as they stayed calm and, like trained dogs, could find their places without any confusion.

Suddenly, a man appeared on the screen, holding papers in his hands. After a while, it turned out that it was a national television newscast. The host happily talked about the new decisions of the eternal President. This week, the President banned street kissing and skirts for women and introduced the death penalty for using the telephone. Everyone in the hall greeted the President’s decision with applause. The presenter continued to discuss the country’s achievements in a recently started war with a neighboring state. We were shown rockets launching into residential buildings and the national army entering the enemy’s cities. People in the hall rose from their seats and cursed the new enemies of the nation.

The tour upon arrival at the office and the scene of watching a large TV set formed one single picture for me. It suddenly became way too clear why people felt alone in our office. Being afraid of my own thoughts, I attempted to suppress them and tried not to pay attention to what was happening around me. Despite trying hard to look normal and conceal my disappointment, I knew deep inside that I would not be able to conform to the ubiquitous absurdity and live there happily, even with enough money. Nothing could stop me from fleeing from the country of nonsense.
