

Chapter 5: Membrane Transport and Cell Signaling

Concept 1

Animal membranes that contain both lipid and protein

- Phospholipids are amphiphilic molecules consisting of a hydrophilic head and two hydrophobic tails
- Amphiphilic molecules in solution or vesicles assemble together to separate hydrophobic tails and disperse hydrophilic heads in the phospholipid bilayer, forming a membrane that separates the two aqueous solutions
- Membranes are asymmetric
- All the lipid heads of the membrane are made of polar molecules having two short chains of hydrophobic tails

The Fluidity of Membranes

- Cholesterol is an important molecule for membranes. Membranes with less cholelsterol are more rigid and less fluid
- Membranes become fluid as temperature increases until they are phospholipid bilayers already packed together with no free space

Temperature Influence on Membrane Fluidity

- Membranes with less cholelsterol are rigid at lower temperatures and more fluid at higher temperatures. Cholesterol stabilizes membrane fluidity under specific environmental conditions
- They allow us through the lipid composition which membrane is composed of changing temperature that maintain membrane fluidity without temperature change

Membrane Transport and Osmosis

- Water moves in and out of cells with osmosis process, and the volume maintains within a certain level unless major variation of protein
- The two types of osmosis are isotonic (equal protein and permeant protein)
- Hypotonic permeant effect (phospholipid) nature of the lipid bilayer. The highly low permeant protein allow to open permeant water effect through permeant permeant (not to open non permeant water)
- Hypertonic permeant effect (phospholipid) nature of the lipid bilayer (not to open)
