

BASIC GASKET APPLICATION GUIDE & MATERIAL SELECTION

Application / Function

Pressure gaskets are generally used to seal and support the flange, the combination of both ends is a flange to allow installation. These consist of 2 gaskets which distribute load (flange is a pressure vessel application as all flanges are made of metal) and to increase the contact. A gasket is used to maintain the pressure in a system and to stop it from leaking through the flange application. The gasket compresses the two components between the mating surfaces of the vessel. This is done by creating a contact force to compress the gasket against the two components between the mating surfaces. If the gasket creates resistance to the pressure and is not compressed through the flange of the application then it would be a good application.

In order to determine the application requirements will require the gasket design to determine the gasket to be used. Every gasket application is unique but there are some common elements that must be addressed to ensure the performance of the gasket in an application.
