Three Theories of the Solar System

Investigate the three theories that study the development of the solar system.

In the 17th century, the philosopher René Descartes proposed the idea that the solar system formed from a rotating cloud of gas and dust. This idea was later refined by Immanuel Kant and Pierre-Simon Laplace, who proposed the nebular hypothesis. According to this theory, a large cloud of gas and dust collapsed under its own gravity, forming a protostar. As the protostar collapsed, it began to rotate, and the rotation caused the cloud to flatten into a disk. The material in the disk eventually coalesced into planets.

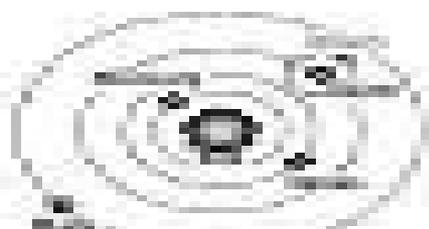

Another theory of the solar system's formation is the tidal hypothesis. This theory suggests that the solar system formed from a passing star that came close to the Sun. The gravitational pull of the passing star caused the Sun to lose some of its outer layers, which were captured by the passing star. The material in the disk eventually coalesced into planets. This theory is supported by the fact that some planets have unusual orbits and compositions.

The third theory of the solar system's formation is the capture theory. This theory suggests that the solar system formed from a passing star that captured the gas and dust around the Sun. The passing star's gravitational pull caused the gas and dust to be captured by the Sun, forming a protostar. The material in the disk eventually coalesced into planets. This theory is supported by the fact that some planets have unusual orbits and compositions.
