Examination of the Stability of Positive Psychological Capital Using Frequency-based Measurement Elizabeth Anne

McGee, 2011 The purpose of this study was to explore the utility of frequency based measurement as an alternative method for examining the stability of psychological capital a higher order construct introduced by Luthans and colleagues 2007 consisting of self efficacy hope resilience and optimism Frequency based measurement is a new approach based on the distributional assessment model Kane 1986 2000 that provides information on the relative frequency of occurrence for specific behaviors over a given period of time and offers a distribution that depicts the scope of an individual's behavior. One advantage of this approach is that it can provide information on a person's behavior over time in a single administration allowing researchers to examine the temporal stability of constructs without having to conduct longitudinal studies e.g. personality (Edwards Woehr 2007). To investigate the usefulness of this new approach a series of studies was conducted using a sample of students from a large southeastern university. The first study compared a frequency based measure of psychological capital to the more traditional Likert type measure. Results indicated that the two are equivalent measures of the central tendency of psychological capital. The frequency based measure was also compared to the Likert type measure given across three contexts: family, school, and social settings in a second study. Results indicated that the two approaches offered similar information in terms of consistency with both approaches demonstrating some variability in responses over time or across contexts. Thus, this study provided further evidence that frequency based measurement offers additional information not available in a single administration using a Likert type measure. The last study investigated agreement between an individual's self-reported psychological capital and ratings of their psychological capital given by an acquaintance. Contrary to my expectations, within item consistency did not moderate self-other agreement. The implications of these findings are outlined in addition to suggestions for future research.
