

NEW YORK SCHOOL

1950s-1970s

The first wave of modern design in America was imported by talent immigrants from Europe seeking to escape the political climate of totalitarianism. These individuals brought Americans a firsthand introduction to the European avant-garde. Despite the European underpinnings, unique aspects of American culture and society dictated an original approach to modern design, known as the New York School.

Emphasis was placed on the expression of ideas and an open, direct presentation of information. In this highly competitive society, novelty of technique and originality of concept were much prized and designers sought simultaneously to solve communicative problems and satisfy a need for personal expression. This phase of American graphic design gained international prominence for its original viewpoints in the 1930s, and continued until the 1970s.

Perhaps more than any other design, Paul Rand revitalized this American approach to modern design. Of all designers of the mid 20th century, Paul Rand epitomized the definition of good design, and he believed that the world could be improved by design. The sensibilities of the New York School were carried to the next coast by Paul Bass who expanded the boundaries of graphic design by devising a new approach to the packaging and marketing of films.
