Answers to Chapter Questions

Memory (Table 5)

1. Memory is anything that is stored and retrievable. It represents the coded and stored set of information in which the individual is able to draw freely to fulfill any of the present or future needs. Some information is stored in the sensory system, while information registered in the short-term system is available only by constantly refreshing the information. Information in the long-term system is available and retrievable only if it has been encoded in such a way that the individual can retrieve it when it is needed. An individual's total amount of information stored is virtually unlimited, while memory's total capacity for all types of codes is finite. People often talk about the size of their memory in terms of their remembering power, but these are really just estimates of memory's effectiveness, rather than their actual storage capacity.

The Short-Term Memory System and the Transfer of the Memory Trace

1. The human memory system processes stimuli sequentially, the information that enters the system sequentially, as noted in the memory curve. An individual's memory capacity, the flow into the system, is finite. However, that finite capacity is continuously replenished, and thus a virtually unlimited amount of information can be processed. The amount of information that enters the system is limited, but the amount of information that can be processed is unlimited. The amount of information that enters the system is limited, but the amount of information that can be processed is unlimited.
