Abstract

This paper reviews the development of ARCH and GARCH models in applied financial econometrics. It discusses the theoretical foundations of these models, their empirical applications, and the challenges associated with their estimation and testing.

Keywords

ARCH, GARCH, volatility, time series, econometrics, financial markets, risk management, forecasting

The ARCH (Autoregressive Conditional Heteroskedasticity) and GARCH (Generalized ARCH) models have become standard tools in applied financial econometrics. They are used to model the time-varying volatility of financial time series, such as stock returns. The basic idea is that the conditional variance of the error term in a regression model is a function of its own past values and the past values of the error term. This allows for the modeling of volatility clusters and the fat tails observed in financial returns. The GARCH model is a generalization of the ARCH model, allowing for a more parsimonious representation of the conditional variance process.

There are several empirical applications of ARCH and GARCH models. One of the most common is the modeling of stock returns. ARCH and GARCH models have been used to estimate the conditional variance of stock returns, which is useful for risk management and portfolio optimization. Another application is in the modeling of exchange rates and interest rates. ARCH and GARCH models have also been used to model the volatility of financial time series in emerging markets and in the context of macroeconomic time series.
