

5 Armature reaction

Earlier, an expression was derived for the induced emf at the terminals of the armature winding under the influence of motion of the conductors under the field established by field poles. But if the generator is to be of some use it should deliver electrical output to a load. In such a case the armature conductors also carry currents and produce a field of their own. The interaction between the fields must therefore must be properly understood in order to understand the behavior of the loaded machine. As the magnetic structure is complex and as we are interested in the flux cut by the conductors, we primarily focus our attention on the surface of the armature. A sign convention is required for mmf as the armature and field mmf are on two different members of the machine. The convention used here is that the mmf acting across the air gap and the flux density in the air gap are shown as positive when they act in a direction from the field system to the armature. A flux line is taken and the value of the current enclosed is determined. As the magnetic circuit is non-linear, the field mmf and armature mmf are separately computed and added at each point on the surface of the armature. The actual flux produced is proportional to the total mmf and the permeance. The flux produced by field and that produced by armature could be added to get the total flux only in the case of a linear magnetic circuit. The mmf distribution due to the poles and armature are discussed now in sequence.

5.0.1 MMF distribution due to the field coils acting alone

Fig. 18 shows the distribution of mmf due to field coils over two pole pitches. It is a step-curve with the width being equal to the pole arc. The permeance variation at the surface is given by Fig. 18 assuming the air gap under the pole to be uniform and neglecting
