Control and Field Instrumentation Documentation

Manufacturers' data and/or design control systems are essential for successful installations that are safely and economically operated. Successful control field instrumentation, the documentation process, cannot just be assumed. Each system is usually created by the engineering firm that designs and constructs the plant. The engineer that implements the project is responsible for maintaining the documentation throughout the engineering and construction phases.

The control system, the plant, and the instrumentation are usually designed and installed together. Today the documentation used for control systems and plants is produced and delivered electronically through both hard and soft copies. The hard copy is maintained by the plant engineering firm for control system design records and is known as the hard-copy control and instrumentation data as maintained at the plant site. Also, the electronic data is maintained in a separate data base for engineering and construction.

Hard Copying — The electronic data of documents that are used in the construction of a project are maintained in a separate data base.

If the documentation generated by the control system does not follow standards that have been established for process instrumentation, they should not be necessary to record process data documentation.

Control System — A computerized, integrated management system that is used to control and monitor the process. The system is designed to provide the operator with the necessary information to operate the plant.
