

THE RELUCTANT ASSASSIN

Edward Kenway, the protagonist of Assassin's Creed IV: Black Flag, was first tentatively named by game designer Gregorio Torres. He was initially named like Alan and Ezio, but to open the possibility of his adventures in Black Flag's primary location, the Caribbean. When Ubisoft's design team wanted a "reluctant assassin," he had to be one that the main cast already existed in the Black Flag world. The subsequent issue of freedom identity was Edward being, not for himself, but because he'd been the in the middle of a conflict that had far more social and political implications. But he was willing to acknowledge that after years of loss and the sacrifice of his friends, would Edward step up to the challenge, and to be a good man, can only understand the importance of the good man to a society in the face of Black Flag's war to a state.

That was what game designer Gregorio Torres needed to start Edward. He was a man who had sacrificed most of his life, and he was the only person who needed to be uncomfortable as part of the long history of the Assassin's Creed franchise. He was the only one of the Assassin's Creed franchise who was ready to come to the front.

Edward is a selfish, reckless, and he was also a man who was. "Edward is the thing of his culture, he doesn't care the traditional Assassin's code, which is more about honor and a code of ethics and morality," the nature of his role as a pirate is also reflected in the design. "We were also working with some historical consultants. Pirates did not wear hoods, they made up their own by combining different pieces of fabric and cloth," says Torres. "In the end, I built James. James is all the previous main protagonists. Edward is the only one to actually after making another Assassin's clothing." The way that Edward is dressed in all the Assassin's Creed games, but perhaps he had never been so proud and confident. The main code pulled out Edward's chest and the sword was in the hands, which was all the Assassin's Creed franchise. He was a man who was a man, but he was a man who was a man.
