The Cronulla riots – the sequence of events

- Reporting period December 10-16, 2005
- Newspapers:
 - The Australian
 - The Sydney Morning Herald
 - Daily Telegraph \(Sydney\)

Introduction – the daily coverage

The series of events that became known as “the Cronulla riots” began in December 2005 with reports of the aftermath of the beating of two swimmers, Timothy Connolly, a southern Irish-born athlete of Sydney. This followed ongoing tensions between Cronulla locals and visitors to the beach. On December 12, white swimmers (many also called surfer boys) were described as race riots, with violence predominantly between predominantly “Irish-Swedish ‘swimmers’ and predominantly Muslim ‘Lifers’”.

The Cronulla riots sparked a wave of charges and counter-charges about responsibility for the violence and, more broadly, about the nature of race relations in Australia. Cronulla locals displayed varying responses, with some claiming that it was “their town” and that the race riots were “imported and paid” by white Australians, while others expressed shame and fear. Some differentiated between those involved in the beating and the subsequent community-wide protests. This range of responses reflected a similar range of reactions from the community-wide protests.

Media coverage of the riots and their aftermath included both factual news reporting of events, accompanying a wide range of opinions from community and political leaders – including Government ministers and representatives of ethnic organisations – as well as sustained feature articles. The events and issues were reported extensively in the three newspapers, and the reporting presented a broad range of angles and perspectives.
