

Chapter 14: Long Term Liabilities

I. Characteristics of a long-term liability

- A. See FASB definition of a liability
- B. Repayment of principal extends beyond 1 year or the operating cycle
- C. Considerable formality associated with long-term debt issuances
 - bond indenture: enforceable contract
 - covenants/restrictions: protection for investor

II. Bonds

A. Valuation

- 1) Present value (PV) of two cash flow streams (the series of interest payments and the principal payment) discounted at the market or effective rate of interest.
- 2) The market and stated interest rates are not usually the same.
 - this difference causes the price of the bond to vary from the face value of the bond.
 - actual cash interest paid/received is determined by multiplying the face/stated amount of the bonds and the stated rate of interest
 - the effective rate of interest is the true rate of interest incurred by the issuer and earned by the investor after taking the price of the bond into account (interest expense = effective rate * carrying value).
- 3) Bonds issued at par:
 - stated rate = market rate
 - price of bond = face value of bond
 - interest expense/revenue = cash paid/received
- 4) Bonds issued at a discount:
 - stated rate < market rate
 - price of bond < face value of bond
 - amortization of discount effectively increases interest expense
- 5) Bonds issued at a premium:
 - price of bond > face value of bond
 - stated rate > market rate
 - amortization of premium effectively decreases interest expense

B. Amortization of Discounts/Premiums

- 1) Use the effective interest method – the straight-line method may be used when the results are not materially different from the effective interest rate method.
- 2) Effective interest rate method results in interest expense that is a constant percentage of the carrying value of the bonds – thus interest expense varies from period to period. In contrast, the straight-line method results in a constant interest expense from period to period.
- 3) Understand the differences between the two methods and how to prepare amortization tables for each method.
