Abstract

While it has become widely known that the use of information technology in the workplace is essential to the success of an organization, the extent to which it is used varies among firms. This paper reports on a survey of 100 small and medium-sized enterprises in the province of Quebec, Canada. The results show that while most firms use information technology, the extent of use varies significantly. The paper also discusses the reasons for these differences and provides some suggestions for future research. The authors conclude that while information technology is essential to the success of an organization, it is not sufficient. Other factors, such as human resources and organizational culture, are also important to the success of an organization.

Keywords: information technology, management, organizational culture, human resources, business success
