

TITANOSAUR

Species: Titanosaurus Vancasteri
 Time: Late Cretaceous
 Diet: Herbivore
 Temperature: Warm, with seasons

Today I finished the construction of the skeleton of the Titanosaurus Vancasteri. Especially a special feature, it is the extremely broadened Scapula which will support the weight of the frontals of the head and all over its body.

Between these plates are its vertebral ribs, Titanosaurus is extremely difficult to put down. In addition, Titanosaurus seems without reason to get lost at various points. Only after considerable work and many corrections could I get this thing done.

With most Scapulae and vertebral columns, Titanosaurus has the same structure, with its broad ribs. This is probably because they apparently did not get any big plants they ate. Titanosaurus ate everything, and certainly did not eat any big plants. They ate anything and everything, and certainly did not eat any big plants.

Amphibian

I suspect that a Titanosaurus, for all its size and weight, is actually not a land animal. Rather, for most of its life it probably lived in the water and only came to land to feed and to lay its eggs. In fact, the whole creature is designed as a water-breathing animal, capable of floating about in the water, and of breathing through its gills. Some animals, like the frog, have their feet webbed on the back of a Titanosaurus.
