Pretending to be Quantum Malvika Joshi,2021 We examine the IQP protocol for verifying quantumness presented by Shepherd and Bremner in 2009 SB09 In this protocol the classical verifier sends a prover an IQP circuit and expects back samples from its output distribution as evidence that the prover has quantum capabilities To test that the samples indeed came from the circuit the verifier checks that they are consistent with the bias of the output distribution of the circuit in the direction of a secret string  $s$  This bias is given by  $1/2^{2g}$  where  $g$  is a parameter associated with the Hamiltonian  $H$  and  $s$  YC20 We study this parameter and give a strategy for forging samples to fool the verifier into believing that a classical prover is quantum with a constant probability dependent on  $g$  We also give a natural method for constructing random circuits with a particular value of  $g$  either  $g=0$  or  $g=1$  We use the classical forging strategy along with the construction methods to show that when  $g$  is small an adversary can extract  $s$  from just  $H$  and forge samples to fool the verifier with high probability We give heuristic arguments for the validity of these attacks and demonstrate their success numerically
