

Best Practices and HPC Strategies for Ansys Mechanical

Challenges

Business requires low-cost, quickly completed structural simulation. Modeling complex geometries, capturing nonlinear material behavior, and ensuring accurate boundary conditions often are tedious, costly, and error-prone tasks. These challenges can be mitigated with three strategies: process automation, distributed computing, and efficient modeling methods.

In addition, engineers increasingly need to simulate a wide range of complex structural forms, and fast business cycles, adding other constraints to models. Evaluating finite element analysis and using smart simulation tools offer significant cost and time benefits.

The above challenges and requirements, coupled with the business world's increasing demand for lower cost and quickly modeled parts without compromising CPU usage, requires a change in the design tools and process workflow. Further, the ability to capture more design iterations, to conduct analysis with less setup, to accelerate time to insight, and to design more models.

Executing large CPU analyses, however, has become an obstacle to design innovation, necessitating ways to overcome structural simulation and simulation bottlenecks.
