Over the past two years, Armenia has experienced a significant drop in investment, exports, and in real incomes primarily caused by the global financial crisis. The Government of Armenia's (GOAM) anti-crisis measures, additional loans and budgetary support from international donors helped to avoid further economic decline in 2010. However, economic indicators, while on the rebound, still fall short of the pre-crisis growth trend for the two decades following independence. Gradual recovery of remittance flows in comparison to 2009 also contributed to the slight upturn. Nevertheless, poverty and prices remain high, the sustainability of growth remains a concern, and the economic reform agenda remains unfinished.

Armenia's gross domestic product (GDP) grew 2.6 percent in 2010, after a 14.4 percent decline in 2009 as a result of the global financial crisis. This was preceded by steady annual real GDP growth from 2002-2008 - including annual double-digit growth from 2002-2007. The actual growth in 2010 failed to reach the Armenian Government and International Monetary Fund (IMF) projections of four percent. Industry became the main driver of GDP
