KEY WORDS Language, Homo sapiens, Human origins, Speech

ABSTRACT The evolution of anatomically modern humans is frequently linked to the development of complex, symbolically based language. Language, functioning as a system of cognition and communication, is suggested to be the key behavior in later human evolution that isolated modern humans from their ancestors. Alternatively, other researchers view complex language as a much earlier hominid capacity, unrelated to the origin of anatomically modern Homo sapiens. The validity of either perspective is contingent upon how language is defined and how it can be identified in the paleoanthropological record. In this analysis, language is defined as a system with external aspects relating to speech production and internal aspects involving cognition and symbolism. The hypothesis that complex language was instrumental in modern human origins is then tested using data from the paleontological and archaeological records on brain volume and structure, vocal tract form, faunal assemblage composition, intra-site diversification, burial treatment, ornamentation and art. No data are found to support linking the origin of modern humans with the origin of complex language. Specifically, there are no data suggesting any major qualitative changes in language abilities corresponding with the 200,000-100,000 BP dates for modern Homo sapiens origins proposed by single origin models or the 40,000-30,000 BP period proposed as the time for the appearance of modern Homo sapiens in Western Europe. Instead, there appears to be archaeological and paleontological evidence for complex language capabilities beginning much earlier, with the evolution of the genus Homo.

The evolution of language and its role in defining human uniqueness has always been a central question of paleoanthropological research. If living humans can indeed be distinguished from other organisms by language, then the origin of the human language system is of critical importance. But when did this system of language evolve, and what was the impact of language on human evolution? Did language emerge early in hominid evolution, or was it a later development? Much recent discussion is on the role of language in the origin of modern Homo sapiens and the development of modern human biological and behavioral diversity (cf. The majority of these authors support the hypothesis that language, as it is structured today, developed late in human evolution and that it
