population being researched is considered vulnerable This Article examines whether 42 medical studies published using the medical records and data of NFL Combine participants comply with the Common Rule and other human subjects research guidelines Given the intense pressure to please NFL clubs and the precariousness of a career in the NFL NFL Combine participants have significantly constrained choices about whether to participate in the research being conducted Consequently it is highly questionable whether informed consent as required by the spirit and letter of the Common Rule is being obtained Additionally given most players limited financial resources and the inequitable power relationship between players and NFL clubs there is a strong argument that NFL Combine participants should be considered a vulnerable research population This argument is bolstered by similarities between the workplaces of NFL players and military personnel a population regularly recognized as vulnerable The Article concludes with five recommendations for better protecting NFL Combine participants in the context of human subjects research 1 requiring researchers and or the Combine participants to read the consent form aloud and audio record the process 2 requiring all research to be approved by the National Football League Players Association 3 requiring consent forms to be provided to the Combine participants agents 4 having IRBs engage the perspective of a player when evaluating research and 5 requiring that Combine participants decision whether or not to participate in the research remain confidential By requiring such protections IRBs have the potential to ensure that NFL Combine participants are being subjected to research in the dignified and respectful matter required by the Common Rule
