The objective of this study was to evaluate the behavior in terms of the permanent deformation of four cold recycled asphalt mixtures stabilized with asphalt emulsion and foamed asphalt. The analysis was conducted considering three flow number test procedures adapted for cold recycled mixtures: (i) ABNT NBR 16505 (method A); (ii) adaptation of the FN test for CRAM according to Kim and Lee's method (method B); (iii) 3D-Move analysis software simulation of pavement structures to address the stress magnitude for the FN test (method C). The influence of the curing process on the performance of the materials was also verified. The study used an extensive database of computed pavement responses from the four different asphalt pavement structures of the experimental section subjected to axial loading of a tandem axle using the 3D-Move pavement response analysis program. The FN results using the 3D-Move data (method C) demonstrated the good mechanical behaviour with respect to permanent deformation of the cold recycled mixtures subject to axial stress and temperature. The method proposed by Kim and Lee (method B) showed little efficacy for the analysis of the CRAMs tested in this work. The ABNT NBR 16505 method (method A), conventionally used for HMA, highlighted the influence of temperature (60°C) on the CRAM mixtures. For all FN test conditions, the curing was a preponderant factor for the performance of cold recycled asphalt mixtures and should be carefully evaluated to simulate the early stage of the mixtures in the field. It is also important to verify the influence of humidity and temperature on the permanent deformation mechanism of cold recycled asphalt mixtures.

1. Introduction

Cold recycling is an increasing trend in rehabilitation, maintenance, and intervention of distressed asphalt pavements. The main advantages of this technique are the economic and environmental benefits allowing faster interventions and shorter traffic disruption [1, 2]. In the recycling process, reclaimed asphalt pavement (RAP), usually generated from pavement milling [3], is incorporated to a new mixture through asphalt binder addition (stabilization). Virgin aggregates can also be incorporated to adjust the mixture's aggregate gradation [4–6].

Cold recycled asphalt mixture (CRAM) is usually stabilized with foamed asphalt or asphalt emulsion. Active fillers may also be added (portland cement, hydrated lime, and others) to improve some mechanical properties, such as moisture resistance, and to increase early age resistance [5–8]. CRAM's mechanical behaviour is dependent on various factors, such as the curing process, reclaimed asphalt pavement (RAP) source and gradation, moisture content, type and content of asphalt stabilization agent (foams or emulsion), presence of active fillers, and volumetric properties [2, 9, 10].

Considering the complex mechanical behaviour of CRAM, additional discussions are necessary on CRAM's mechanical behaviour in the laboratory. An appropriate laboratory characterization of the CRAM may increase projects' reliability, durability, and may reduce costs. Therefore, this work aims to assess the permanent deformation of four different CRAMs (these mixtures have been used as the base course in an experimental test section), stabilized with asphalt emulsion and foamed asphalt,
