

Psychological Well-Being and Job Satisfaction as Predictors of Job Performance

The happy-productive worker hypothesis has most often been examined in organizational research by correlating job satisfaction to performance. Recent research has expanded this to include measures of psychological well-being. However, to date, no field research has provided a comparative test of the relative contribution of job satisfaction and psychological well-being as predictors of employee performance. The authors report 2 field studies that, taken together, provide an opportunity to simultaneously examine the relative contribution of psychological well-being and job satisfaction to job performance. In Study 1, psychological well-being, but not job satisfaction, was predictive of job performance for 47 human services workers. These findings were replicated in Study 2 for 37 juvenile probation officers. These findings are discussed in terms of research on the happy-productive worker hypothesis.

If you want to be happy, be. —Alexei Konstantinovich Tolstói, Collected Works of Kosma Prudkov (1884)

One of the most persistent topics of human interest appears to be the pursuit of well-being or “happiness” (B. Russell, 1930). Generally speaking, when researchers use the term happiness, they are usually referring to an individual’s psychological or subjective well-being (Diener, 1984; Diener, Sub, Lucas, & Smith, 1999). Although not identical constructs, these terms are often used interchangeably, but scholars prefer the term well-being to avoid the imprecision and lay connotation captured in the looser term happiness (Diener, 1984). Psychological well-being has three defining characteristics. First, well-being is a phenomenological event (Diener, 1994; Parducci, 1995). In other words, people are happy when they subjectively believe themselves to be so. Second, well-being involves some emotional conditions. In particular, psychologically well people are more prone to experience positive emotions and less prone to experience negative emotions (Argyle, 1987; Diener & Larsen, 1993; Larsen & Diener, 1992; Warr, 1987, 1990). Third, well-being refers to one’s life as a whole. It is a global evaluation (Diener, 1994; Myers, 1992; Veenhoven, 1988).

The happy-productive worker hypothesis has intrigued organizational scholars at least since the seminal Hawthorne experiments (Roethlisberger & Dickson, 1939). According to this hypothesis, “happy” workers demonstrate higher levels of job-related performance behaviors than do “unhappy” employees (Brief, 1998; Spector, 1997). Generally speaking, this hypothesis has typically been operationalized by correlating employee self-ratings of job satisfaction with supervisory ratings of performance. Thus, for many applied researchers, job satisfaction and happiness have become closely linked together (Wright & Doherty, 1998).

Over the years, several authors have provided comprehensive reviews of the satisfaction-performance relationship (see Brayfield & Crockett, 1955; Iaffaldano & Muchinsky, 1985; Locke, 1976; Petty, McGee, & Cavender, 1984; Vroom, 1964). For instance, Vroom (1964) observed in his classic study that the median correlation between these two variables was a modest .14. Unfortunately, interpretation of this result is subject to speculation, as Vroom inappropriately mixed both employee-level and work-group-level studies in his reported results. As a consequence, different conclusions are obtained when one removes the group-based studies from Vroom’s analysis.¹ A later, highly influential meta-analytic review by Iaffaldano and Muchinsky (1985) reported an average true score correlation of .17 between job satisfaction and job performance. However, this correlation represents the average of the correlations between each of the facet measures of satisfaction
