"It's One Less Plate That They're Spinning". Graphic Novels to Help Struggling Writers? Christina Voss (married Lyons),2021-10-25 Seminar paper from the year 2010 in the subject English Language and Literature Studies Literature grade A Southern Illinois University Carbondale Curriculum it need not be a whole novel rendered in pictures it can start with simple letter recognition The present study will deal with a struggling writer s experiences with graphic novels My single case study participant is a 6th grade male struggling writer of African descent born in the U S He is not professionally diagnosed but has an IEP at his middle school for executive function disorder which officially does not exist as a disease His teachers have noticed that he has trouble executing written tasks although he is perfectly able to dictate content of high quality It seems to be not only a graphomotor dysfunction for he can type a little better than handwrite the main problem for him is to start a writing task and also to finish it As preliminary data from a year long tutoring experience in a local Reading Clinic revealed during which time I worked with him first in a classroom environment for half a year and then in my office with just two tutees present the boy reads at 9th grade level however when asked to do a quickwrite in 10 minutes he can only come up with sentences like Can I have a drink please whereas the other

tutees managed to write half a page or a page of a story His handwriting is huge uneven bears mechanical errors although not enough to call him dyslexic for his age category and so slow paced that he cannot manage to finish a task in a given time In clear opposition to this stands the observation that Remy has an astonishingly advanced vocabulary when talking to him one thinks he is much older and more mature and very polite and well behaved This impression fades when one tutors him and he exhibits unsuppressed child like behavior like farting and belching without embarrassment The other participants are 28 teachers professors who use graphic novels and took an online survey 2 high school English teachers who do not use graphic novels and were interviewed personally 20 authors and illustrators as well as scholarly reviewers of graphic novels who took their respective online surveys
