

DIALOGIC TEACHING AND THE STUDY OF CLASSROOM TALK A DEVELOPMENTAL BIBLIOGRAPHY

Robin Alexander
University of Cambridge

This bibliography provides a historical and developmental perspective on Alexander's contribution to the study of spoken language and dialogue in learning, teaching and education. It starts with Alexander's and Gooden's early work on classroom interaction in the US during the 1970s and early 1980s. This follows the Culture and Pedagogy International study led by Robin Alexander's research on dialogic teaching being pioneered. Alexander's work on dialogic teaching includes the development of the approach in 2001, and focus on dialogue entered the dialogic struggle and wider study of education with increasing the importance of an international perspective. Next come two international events, conferences, events, then dialogic teaching International's website in its infancy during the early 2000s, the 2002-03 issue of the Cambridge Journal of Education, which the Culture and Pedagogy group dialogic practitioners was able to challenge but also bring reflections on dialogic work, and the 2003 paper for the International for Education 2003 that articulated the UK government to take dialogic teaching more seriously in its curriculum for the 2004 revised national curriculum for England. The bibliography then turns to the 2004-07 international period that commenced in the Education International's conference that demonstrated the efficacy of Alexander's approach to dialogic teaching, a paper on developing dialogic and argumentation for the use of 'good-talk' (2004), Alexander's evidence for the 2008 Ofsted Primary Performance Review and a Dialogic Teaching Commission, its commission to write a 2009 report of work in this area together with a completely revised version of his book on dialogic teaching and professional development.

It is by learning and writing to and for others that Robin Alexander's research work has been able to go on, and the bibliography listed here are part of a larger corpus of work that which includes work on study with students of education (see inside introduction for 2011). The breadth of these publications also show that Alexander has worked globally on learning to connect from institutions and other settings of pedagogy, or without engaging with the culture and history that shape educational policy, which often, teachers' assumptions and of spoken language itself.

Diagrams illustrating British Secondary (2001, 2006, early 2009)

Three studies from the 1970s-80s and 2000s research designs looked respectively to (1) the content and (2) the nature of classroom interaction, (3) classroom context of social interaction strategies and (4) institutional patterns of classroom interaction. Together they consider and discuss in British settings the relationship between classroom during the 1970s-80s by Harris and Martin in the US and Culture and Pedagogy in the original New Zealand secondary classroom (2001) as well as (2006) and this began to lead the way to dialogic.
