Diffusion Through a Membrane

A Laboratory Activity for the Living Environment

Diffusion is an important living process. It allows the cells of an organism to obtain the substances they need to survive. In other organisms, it allows the cells to get rid of the wastes they produce. In plants, it allows the cells to obtain the water they need to continuously grow. In all cases, the process is the same. Molecules of a substance move from an area of greater concentration to an area of lower concentration. Diffusion continues until the molecules are evenly distributed. In the diagram, the molecules of the substance that were first located in the beaker on the left have diffused to beaker on the right. The concentration of the substance is the same throughout the beaker on the right.

Some cells have membranes that are partially permeable. This means they allow some substances to pass through them, but not others. Some substances can pass through the membrane, but others cannot. The substances that can pass through the membrane are called permeable. The substances that cannot pass through the membrane are called impermeable.

Living cells are surrounded by a membrane that is both a partially permeable membrane and a cell wall and are permeable. The membrane is partially permeable because it allows some substances to pass through it, but not others. The substances that can pass through the membrane are called permeable. The substances that cannot pass through the membrane are called impermeable. The permeability of the membrane can change. For example, a partially permeable membrane can become completely permeable if it is heated.

Some parts of the cell wall are not fully permeable. This means that some substances can pass through them, but not others. The substances that can pass through the membrane are called permeable. The substances that cannot pass through the membrane are called impermeable. The permeability of the membrane can change. For example, a partially permeable membrane can become completely permeable if it is heated.
