Abstract

Distillation method is an important commercial process for purification of materials. Extraction of the limonene oil was conducted using one type of method called steam distillation. The oil collected from distilling the sample was then analyzed through performing addition tests. And the chemical reactions that took place lead to the identification of its olefinic group.

Keywords: distillation, terpenes, limonene, alkenes

Introduction

For centuries, human beings have known that volatile oils with a variety of fragrances and flavors could be isolated from certain plants. These compounds occur in all parts of the plants and are called essential oils. They are of great commercial importance in the perfume and flavoring industries, and many also have been used medicinally. The chemical constituents of essential oils have a wide variety of structures; many of them contain rings or more double bonds.

After many years of carrying out structural determinations on these interesting and challenging compounds, chemists began to detect some patterns that most of these compounds are composed of multiple 5 carbon atoms. Whole families of compounds
