1. INTRODUCTION

Electronic Human Resource Management (E-HRM) was first defined in the late 1990s when e-commerce was expanding throughout the business world (Kovach, Hughes, Fagan & Maggitti, 2002; Olivas-Lujan, Raminéz & Zapata-Cantu, 2007). In this regard, E-HRM has been interchangeably used with virtual HRM, human resource (HR) intranet, web-based HR, computer-based human resource management systems (CHRIS) and HR portals.

According to Panayaotopoulou, Vakola and Galanaki (2007), as technology is enhanced, organizations can make use of information systems for the management of significant number of HR processes effectively and in turn, this would contribute to making strategically significant information and knowledge available in order to enhance competitive advantage. The organizational core is formed by HR and thus, no matter how advanced the manufacturing procedure is or how revolutionary the product is that needs conceptualization, it entails qualitative and quantitative methods along with the entire breadth of HRM.
