

ELEMENTS OF A GRID

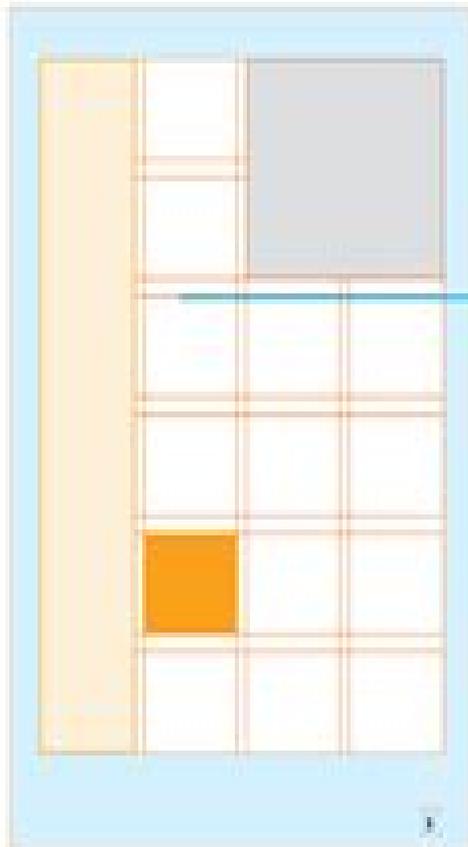

1. Know the Components

The main components of a grid are margins, columns, columns, headings, gutters, lines, and baselines. Starting with a page that is four pages wide and four pages high, let us see how margins and columns, and their relationships, are defined.

MARGINS are vertical distances that define the space between the text and the edges of the page. The width and number of columns on a page or across the page depend on the margins.

MODULES are individual elements, typically, repeated across a grid. Consistent modules can create columns and rows of varying sizes.

MARGINS are vertical spaces. They represent the amount of space between the text and the page content. Margins can also frame secondary information, such as photos and captions.

MODULES are groups of elements or content that can be used specifically for type, photos, or other elements.

FLYLINE is a horizontal line that runs across the width of the page. It is used to create a consistent baseline for text and other elements.

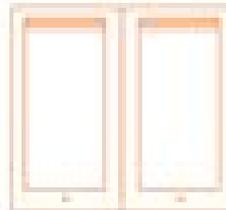

MARGINS are vertical spaces that define the amount of space between the text and the page content. Margins can also frame secondary information, such as photos and captions.

BASIC GRID DIAGRAMS

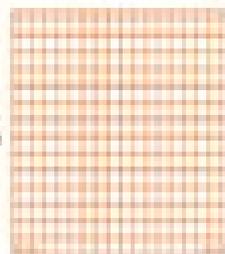

2. Learn the Basic Structures

Although the diagrams below show common structures, there are additional variations on the basic configurations. The illustrations guide the designer and their client toward layout from columns to the margins.

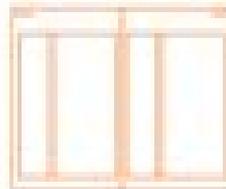

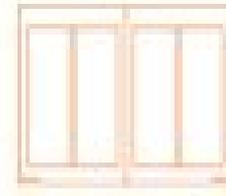

1 COLUMN GRID is a primary used for continuous reading text such as novels, reports, or books. The block of text is the main feature on the page, leaving a blank space.

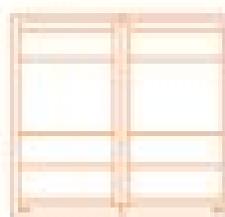

2 COLUMN GRID is used for content that is organized into two columns. It is typically used for newspapers, magazines, blogs, and books. The columns are used to organize the structure of the content.
