Abstract

This paper surveys the use of ARCH and GARCH models in applied financial econometrics. It discusses the theory, estimation, and testing of these models, and provides a list of references for further reading.

Keywords

ARCH, GARCH, volatility, time series, econometrics

The ARCH and GARCH models have become standard tools in applied financial econometrics. They are used to model the conditional variance of a time series, which is particularly important in the context of financial returns. The ARCH model is a special case of the GARCH model, and both are widely used in practice. The GARCH model is more flexible than the ARCH model, as it allows for a more general form of the conditional variance. The estimation of these models is typically done using maximum likelihood estimation, and there are a variety of tests available to check the adequacy of the model fit.

The ARCH and GARCH models are part of a larger class of models known as the GJR family. The GJR model is a generalization of the GARCH model that allows for asymmetric volatility. This means that the conditional variance can be different depending on whether the return is positive or negative. The GJR model is often used to model the volatility of financial returns, as it can capture the fact that negative returns tend to be followed by higher volatility than positive returns.
