

Kin remissions of Trauma

By J. R. Hayes, M. J. Frueh, J. M. Frueh, & J. M. Frueh

Abstract. Kin remissions of trauma (KRT) are defined as the remission of trauma symptoms in a family member of a trauma survivor. This review examines the theoretical and empirical literature on KRT. Theoretical models of KRT are discussed, including the role of genetic factors, shared environmental factors, and the role of the trauma survivor in the development of KRT. Empirical studies of KRT are reviewed, including studies of KRT in children, adolescents, and adults. The review concludes that KRT is a complex phenomenon that is influenced by a variety of factors, including genetic factors, shared environmental factors, and the role of the trauma survivor. Further research is needed to better understand the mechanisms of KRT and to develop interventions to help trauma survivors and their families.
