Bleeding the Team Colors Hollie Deis,2016 Social media marketing is a rapidly growing trend Visual social media platforms such as Instagram are being used by athletes and teams alike This thesis uses the principles of brand attachment and identification to examine the emotional connection that fans form with professional athletic teams as brands This study assessed whether Instagram followers in the digital native age range had greater brand attachment and identification than non followers Results showed that fans who followed their favorite professional athletics team on Instagram had greater brand attachment identification and ability to identify particular branded product meanings more than non followers Overall implications of this thesis can add to the marketing field It is important to recognize that following a team on social media is a larger factor of brand attachment and identification than gender race or education level This can forward the field of communication by adding to the literature on social media and branding messages Social media is likely here to stay so all types of brands need to understand how their consumers are responding to their messages
