Abstract:- Satellites for communication services have evolved quite significantly in size and power since the launch of the first commercial satellites in 1965. This has permitted a consequent reduction in the size of earth stations, and hence their cost, with a consequent increase in number. Small stations, with antennas in the order of 1.2–1.8 m, have become very popular under the acronym VSAT, which stands for 'Very Small Aperture Terminals'. Such stations can easily be installed at the customer's premises and, considering the inherent capability of a satellite to collect and broadcast signals over large areas, are being widely used to support a large range of services. Examples are broadcast and distribution services for data, image, audio and video, collection and monitoring for data, image and video, two-way interactive services for computer transactions, data base inquiry, internet access and voice communications. This work will give brief summary of the installation process of VSAT.

I. INTRODUCTION

VSAT, now a well established acronym for Very Small Aperture Terminal, was initially a trademark for a small earth station marketed in the 1980s by Telecom General in the USA. Its success as a generic name probably comes from the appealing association of its first letter V, which establishes a 'victorious' context, or may be perceived as a friendly sign of participation, and SAT which definitely establishes some reference to satellite communications.

The use of the word 'terminal' which appears in the clarification of the acronym will be replaced by 'earth station', or station for short, which is the more common designation in the field of satellite communications for the equipment assembly allowing reception from or transmission to a satellite. The word terminal will be used to designate the end user equipment (telephone set, facsimile machine, television set, computer, etc.) which generates or accepts the traffic that is conveyed within VSAT networks. This complies with regulatory texts, such as those of the International Telecommunications Union (ITU), where for instance equipment generating data traffic, such as computers, are named 'Data Terminal Equipment' (DTE).

VSATs are one of the intermediary steps of the general trend in earth station size reduction that has been observed in satellite communications since the launch of the first communication satellites in the mid 1960s. Indeed, earth stations have evolved from the large INTELSAT Standard A earth stations equipped with antennas 30 m wide, to today's receive-only stations with antennas as small as 60 cm for direct reception of television transmitted by broadcasting satellites, or hand held terminals for radiolocation such as the Global Positioning System (GPS) receivers. Present day hand held satellite phones (IRIDIUM, GLOBALSTAR) are pocket size. Therefore, VSATs are at the lower end of a product line which offers a large variety of communication services.

The three major components are the antenna, the transceiver and the modem.
