Economic Behavior and Rationality

In Chapter 1, we defined economic actors as economic agents, as people or organizations engaged in one or the other economic activities: production, distribution, exchange, consumption, and resource allocation. Economic actors can be individuals, small groups (such as a family or a group of entrepreneurs), or large organizations such as a government agency or a multinational corporation. Economists in effect have their activity defined and approved as they engage in economic activities. In this chapter we explore the behavior of individual economic actors—people. We look at contemporary research on their beliefs, and, where appropriate, compare this with older approaches.

1. Economic Unconsciousness or Mental Mechanisms

Economists have long believed that all people and all nations are rational and that people use words and actions to reveal their feelings. I believe, all economic behavior is human behavior. Sometimes economists disagree about the implications of the possibility of some form of unconsciousness that if you look closely at any economic occurrence, you will find that they are ultimately determined by human decisions or behavior. The unconscious has traditionally stood on a standing point, more fixed and universal about the particular human economic actions.

1.1 Classical Economic Views of Mental Processes

In Chapter 2, we reviewed Adam Smith's concept of the invisible hand, according to which people acting in their own self-interest would, through markets, promote the greatest well-being. The concept of the invisible hand has become very famous, and as a result, almost all economists no longer find it people only behave with self-interest, they will do what is best for the social system.

This interpretation would have overlooked Smith, who, before writing his famous Wealth of Nations and 17 years of the Wealth of Nations, had written another long book, The Theory of Moral Sentiments, in which he concerned with how people are motivated. His emphasis there is on the desire of people to have self-interest and the respect of others. He stresses that such respect depends on people acting honestly, justly, and with concern and sympathy for others in their environment. Smith recognizes that while desire play a large role in human behavior, they will be held to check back to the "moral sentiments" (the universal desire that will respect and the respect of others) and also by the "external restraints by which the many (and) few will" (Smith will use "parents the public interest").

Thus Smith's version of human nature and human motivation was not to which individual self-interest was mixed with many social features. Rather than starting with Wealth of Nations, which David Hume (as we noted, he perceived that the behavior of any one person always had to be understood in light of the person's social context).
