

Alligators

Scientists have conducted experiments on many different aspects of alligator behavior. Some of their findings, presented in illustrations, show alligator feeding behavior with information they will share in general science journal articles. About a dozen different sized alligators participated in feeding trials. Alligator weight was recorded in kilograms. Study an alligator for several days to determine its daily food intake and then record that data for three consecutive days.

Over time, scientific investigations focused on the alligators, they consistently studied the alligator's weight. Scientists also measured temperature, blood composition, etc. They observed the alligator's growth record information by measuring the alligator's head length and girthed alligators. They also created standards with body and tail length when alligators weighed for tracking their growth.

Multiple measurements provide better data when researchers want things to get the an percentage (weight) as they want to be a comparison against the alligator. I added the values together to create a new length variable. Then I put the new variable, the weight, on the y-axis. I had two graphs the data at each of alligators.
