

UNIT 7: WDM CONCEPTS AND COMPONENTS

- The technology of combining a number of different independent information carrying wavelengths into the same fiber is known as wavelength division multiplexing or WDM.

Overview of WDM

- With the advent of high quality light sources with extremely narrow spectral emission widths many independent wavelength channels spaced less than a nanometer apart could be placed on the same fiber. For eg. The modulated output of a DFB laser has spectral emission width of less than 10^{-1} nm.
- With such light sources the use of WDM allows a dramatic increase in the capacity of an optical fiber compared to the original simple point to point link that carried only single wavelength.
- Another advantage of WDM is that various optical channels can support different transmission formats.
- Thus, by using separate wavelengths differently formatted signals at any data rate can be sent simultaneously and independently over the same fiber without the need for common signal structure.

Operational principles of WDM

- The implementation of WDM networks requires that a variety of passive and active devices to combine, distribute, isolate and amplify optical power at different wavelengths.
- Passive devices require no external control for their operation. These components are mainly used to split and combine or tap off optical signals.
- Active devices are wavelength dependent and can be controlled electronically or optically, thereby providing a large degree of flexibility. Active WDM components include tunable optical filters, tunable sources and optical amplifiers.

Fig. Implementation of typical WDM system containing various types of optical amplifiers.

- Fig. above shows the implementation of passive and active components in a typical WDM link.
- At the transmitting end there are several independently modulated light sources, each emitting signals at a unique wavelength.
- Here a multiplexer is needed to combine these optical outputs into a continuous spectrum of signals and couple them into a single fiber.
