

Costal Engineering

Costal Engineering is a branch of civil engineering that deals with the design and construction of structures and systems that are exposed to the forces of the sea. This includes the design of harbours, piers, breakwaters, and coastal defences. It also involves the study of coastal erosion and the development of strategies to protect the coastline.

The main objective of costal engineering is to provide a safe and secure environment for the coastal population and to protect the natural resources of the coast. This is achieved by the design and construction of structures that are able to withstand the forces of the sea. The design of these structures is based on a detailed study of the coastal environment and the forces that act on it. This includes the study of the waves, the tides, and the wind. The design of the structures is also based on the requirements of the coastal population and the natural resources of the coast.

Costal engineering is a multidisciplinary field that involves the use of a wide range of engineering disciplines. This includes civil engineering, structural engineering, and environmental engineering. The design of costal structures is also based on the principles of fluid mechanics and geotechnical engineering. The design of these structures is a complex task that requires a deep understanding of the coastal environment and the forces that act on it.
