The healthcare industry and accreditation agents of allied health programs establish critical competencies for success in today s healthcare market Competencies of critical thinking communication skills and collaboration are key outcomes essential to today s learner Teaching these core competencies to students of today are different from students of the past as learning preferences for students have evolved due to technological innovation in society With the change in preferences for learning teaching methodology must change to meet the needs of today's workforce. The flipped classroom provides opportunities for students to develop deeper learning and synthesis of material through pre-class content and classroom active learning activities. Semi-structured interviews of key informants identified through purposive sampling were utilized in this project to identify steps to take, challenges, best practices, and methods utilized in order to develop a consensus of required elements for success when implementing a flipped classroom. Three overarching themes resulted from the inquiry including design, outcomes, and change in perspective. From these findings, a program that can assist faculty in implementing a flipped classroom instructional design was created.
