

Cell Biology: Membrane Systems (continued)

In the cytoplasm, you will find a few mitochondria, which are the powerhouses of the cell. They take in glucose and oxygen and produce energy for the cell. They also have their own DNA and ribosomes. They are surrounded by a double membrane. They are found in the following organelles: Mitochondria, Chloroplasts, and Vacuoles.

For each of the organelles, describe the following: 1) structure, 2) function.

- 1. Mitochondrion: structure: bean-shaped, contains cristae; function: produces ATP through cellular respiration.
- 2. Chloroplast: structure: green, contains chlorophyll; function: converts light energy into chemical energy through photosynthesis.
- 3. Vacuole: structure: large, fluid-filled sac; function: stores water and other substances, maintains turgor pressure.

What are the main differences between these organelles? How do they differ in structure and function? How do they differ in the way they are surrounded? How do they differ in the way they are used? How do they differ in the way they are located? How do they differ in the way they are inherited? How do they differ in the way they are passed on? How do they differ in the way they are used?
