Is There an Albanian Question? Judy Batt, 2008 Is there an Albanian question If so what is it Is it a traditional national question centred on the dream of a Greater Albania that would gather in all the Albanian communities in the Balkans Many outside observers in particular among the Albanians neighbours in the Balkans see it that way and fear its destabilising consequences but none of the contributors to this Chaillot Paper finds this scenario convincing The core of the Albanian national question today is Kosovo an issue that has the power to unite Albanians in the Balkans and in the sizeable diaspora communities spread across the globe While the answer for Albanians is independence for Kosovo beyond that views diverge It seems that only a minority of Albanians remain committed to the project of Pan Albanian political unification Most Albanians are fully aware of the diversity of interests of the various Albanian communities in the Balkans who have lived in different states over the past century The end of communism made it much easier for Albanians to keep in contact with each other but this did not lead to greater national cohesion The dramatic high politics of the Kosovo issue tends to obscure the fact that for most Albanians the most urgent questions today are not national ones at all but questions of economic underdevelopment unemployment the quality of democratic governance political corruption and criminality and the emigration of large numbers of the brightest and best of the younger generation None of these challenges is unique to the Albanians but they possess a particular asset in their young diaspora in the West closely linked via the internet with young democracy activists in the Albanians Balkans homelands This new generation of Albanians aims to leap out of the isolation and introversion of traditional village and clan based politics to form a new post modern transnational political community committed to building democracy within their states and across them
